I'm writing a essay about leadership and I'm having a very hard time focussing and wording it all and I realized that talking about leadership in a conversation with people like a debate would probably help a lot. So debate about what leadership is? Please.

It's a essay for this leadership program at the FBI Training Headquarters that I'm applying for and it means a lot to me. I've actually been crying I'll admit to it.

Oh man. That's a difficult one. I don't have an answer that would be anywhere near acceptable. My best advice would be to look at your favorite leader, whether it be someone you know personally, someone from history, or maybe someone from a book. Then make a list of qualities and accomplishments of that person, and try to figure out why they are a good leader, then do the same thing with this other person over here, and then figure out why this other person isn't a good leader. Then break it down, try to figure out why people would follow them.
Sorry I couldn't give you a straight answer. But I think your answer needs to come from you, if you get it from someone else, it isn't genuine. Good luck with your essay!

It's ok Key.

I define Leadership as being able to help others and to be able to lead other people in order to succeed.

I've always thought of leadership as possessing the natural charisma and confidence to take charge and have others allow you

I've always categorized leadership (well, good leadership) as somone that people will follow willingly and voluntarily, and not out of a fear. Leadership means knowing the group's best interests and working to attain them. It's all about reasonable compromise, having a healthy amount of give-and-take in order to keep things running smoothly. A good leader listens to the concerns and ideas of the people who follow them, and addresses them. A leader is someone who treats their followers as equals and doesn't allow their power to get to their heads. They don't have to be kind, but they have to be fair.

@Scientist: that's a good idea, thank you! What I meant was you would voice your opinion on it and than I would voice mine because for some reason I'm pretty good at voicing my opinion in conversation but when it comes to writing it's a absolute struggle for me.

Okay, so...(here's from my cringy essay on leadership)

I think leadership is the act of assuming responsibility and being willing to take things to another level through effort and persistence, with an open mind in case of failure.

What would you like to debate about? :D I'll try to help in any way I can.

@Scientist: that's a good idea and what I meant is you would voice your opinion on what leadership is and than I could voice mine because whenever I'm in somewhat of a debate I'm able to voice my opinion pretty well but any other time it's a very hard struggle.
